Entrepreneurship and peace:

Symposium, 17th November, Geneva.

Participants discussed the important role of entrepreneurs in conflict and post-conflict societies because they are in the middle of an intimate relationship between peace and economic prosperity.. Economic growth reduces the likelihood of conflicts and civil wars. At the same time, conflict and poverty are strictly linked. Poverty, low per capita income, lack of improvement perspectives and hopes in a better future are all factors that increase significantly the risk of violence. Peace and economic development are bound together in a vicious or virtuous circle. For economic agents to flourish, that is, to produce and trade goods and services, peace is a precondition. shared - that can foster peace. Protected private property, fair competition, access to resources, equal opportunities, effective governance, these are all conditions to sustainable peace and factors influencing positively entrepreneurial activities. The newly adopted agenda for the sustainable development goals (SDGs) makes entrepreneurship and peace complementary and mutually reinforcing. More specifically, the targets listed in Goal 16 - "Promoting peaceful and inclusive societies" - can be met, among others, by promoting entrepreneurial ecosystems. A strong investment climate, so crucial in post-conflict situations, also rests on the creation of more entrepreneurial ecosystems. Mr. Thomas Oloya contributed to the discussion on "entrepreneurship and peace" at the occasion of this symposium. His story illustrates well the difficulties and the potential of entrepreneurship in a post-conflict situation. He attended the UNCTAD-Empretec Business Entrepreneurship Startup Tool (BEST) training and started his own fisheries. Today, he earns over 20 million UGX per season from the fishing business. He has also started a piggery business to scale up his business operations.
